DETECTIVE CHIEF TELLS GRAND JURY OF "THIRD DEGREE"

Questions Put to Lanford Indicate That Investigation of Police Methods Is Being Conducted.

created such widespread discussion dur-ing the Mary Phagan murder investi-gation, has been thoroughly explained to the grand jury by Detective Chief Newport A. Lanford, who appeared be-fore that body at its request. Detective John Black, of headquar-ters, who has been an active figure in the Phagan case, is also said to have been quizzed about methods employed by the police and detectives. He will not talk of the subject. Membors of the jury are reluctant to give any in-formation.

Chief Lanford, however, willingly told a Constitution reporter of his tes-timony before the jury and of the na-ture of queries which were put to him. He says he gave a complete and ap-parently satisfactory account of the "third. degree" and the manner in which it is practiced at police head-quarters. quarters.

Is Jury Probing Police Methods? The bellef is provalent in both police and court circles that a secret probe is being promoted by the grand jury into methods employed by both the police and detective dopartments, and that it was in pursuit of this investi-gation that the detective head and Black wore examined. Chief Lanford is inclined to scout this theory, al-though he is unable to account for the testimony that was required of him and of Black in the "third degree" probe. Is Jury Probing Police Methods? probo,

The use of the "third degree" during The use of the "third degree" during the Phagan mystery has caused much comment. Its most effective employ-ment, it will be recalled, was in ex-tracting three sensational confessions from the negro sweeper, James Conley. Newt Lee, the negro watchman, the first suspect in the murder case, was subjected to a "degree" equally as strenuous.

strenuous. The public letter of Mrs. Leo Frank, in which she took the detectives and Kolicitor General Dorsey to task for subjecting her servant girl, Minola McKnight, to a system of cross-exam-ination, which, she asserted, left the girl in a state of exhaustion, probably served to actuate the jury's inquiry into police methods. Mrs. Frank's let-ter was a stinging arraignment, and many other such letters have attacked the detectives and police severely. Not a Torture Method.

Chief Lanford, in his talk, averred that the public has the wrong conception of the "third degree," and naturally pictured it as a torture method. This is wholly wrong, he declared, and atterly at variance with the explanation which he gave to the granid jury.

The "third degree," he told the jury, is one of the most valuable assets of the detective department, and without it many of a city's most glaring crimes would go forever unsolved. He admitted that in one era of police history the method had heen barbarous, but declared that in the present day science and skill had replaced the torture of the past.

In Conley's case Chief Lanford told the jury the negro's confession ind been secured through clover detective work in confronting him with damaging discrepancies in his stories of innocence. The method employed with him is a popular one and is a plan that has served successfully with negro criminals.

"It is worked in this manner," the chief said. "Only two men operate the scheme. They study their subject thoroughly by preliminary convorsations, learn his traits of character and his weak points. Then they warm up to the real work—clamp down the screws, so to speak.

How Confession Is Secured.

"The first detective begins to taunt and deride the prisoner. If confronts him with all incriminating evidence gathered against him, pictures the form of punishment to which he is liable and vividly illustrates the fate of others in predicaments similar to the prisoner's. The detective's attitude is threatening and belilgerent. When the subject is worked up into a state of fear the belilgerent examiner leaves the room in an assumed fit of anger.

"The second detective, who has quietly watched his fellow sheuth's operations, during which he has looked on, distinterestedly, takes up the 'degree' where the other left off. Ho affects an entirely different attitudo; He soothes the prisoner, encourages him and offers sympathy. His partner, he tells the prisoner, is quick of temper and is easily prejudiced.

per and is easily projudiced. "The prisoner is warned that the detective who threatened will strive to convict and is prevaled upon to confess in order to save himself from the vengeance of the sleuth who has just left the room. With assumed sympathy, encouragement and advice, the second detective almost invariably cajoles a confession from the 'third degree' subject."

Different Treatment Needed,

With white prisoners the method is different. They are credulous and prejudiced against detectives and are keen to divine the false attitude of sympathy which wins so easily over the negro. The whites are subjected to an incessant volley of questions for many hours.

These methods are calculated to frazle the nerves and drive the subject into admission. The duration of the "degree" is generally the most offective phase of the entire examination. Under the severe mental pressure created by the constant necessity of having to meet the bombardment of questions with plausible answers and the accompanying physical strain the guilty prisoner frequently reaches a point of exhaustion which forces confession.

The inocent subject is seldom forced to endure such methods. His innocence is easily divined by his frankness, his corroborative answers and his story. Guilt is quickly detected in even the shrewdest and most experionced of crooks. Even the best of rehearsed stories are often broken down under the strain of constant examination.

Series of Examinations.

As explained by Chief Lanford, the "third degree" is morely the last of a series of examinations. In the first degree the prisoner is allowed to tell his story without cross-examination. He signs a written statement, follow ing which the detectives "run it down." Inding whatever discrepancies they may and obtaining corroboration. The second degree is for the purpose of confronting the subject with the faults in his tale and the avidence uncarthed against him. If he fails to confess in this stage of the examination he is forced to remain in solitude and confinement for hours, to meditate over the situation, sum up the probability of conviction and to consider the strain to which he will be subjected in the following degree, of which he has been made vividly awars during the previous examination.

The queries put to him by the grand jury, says the chief, were of a nature meant to ascertain whether or not the police methods were tortuous and whether or not they often resulted in prisoners making false confessions in order to escape suffering. The chief declares he informed the jury that the methods were not barbarous and that it was only the guilty who suffered and that they experienced suffering only through the mental strain which attended the necessity of having to answer volleys of questions with faked answers.

So far as is known the jury has taken no action regarding their investigation of police methods. Lanford expresses belief that they were pleased with his explanation of the "third degree" and that they have learned definitely that it is only a mothod of science and not torture.
